In 1555, a man from France named Nostradamus, who said he could see the future, published a book of predictions for the future of humanity. This work is now famous because people believe he predicted some things correctly. There are parts of the prophecies that seem to be about the death of Henry II of England, the Great London Fire of 1666, the French Revolution, Adolph Hitler, and the atomic bomb.

Other people observe that Nostradamus made hundreds of predictions. Almost all of them were published as poems and without specific dates or names. That makes it easy for people to interpret the predictions later, after events happen, so that they fit the events. What do you think? Can some people really see the future, or is there a more realistic explanation for such predictions?

- Nostradamus was from England / France / Europe.
- He is famous because he said he could see dead people / things and people from the past / things that would happen in the future.
- Some of Nostradamus' prophecies include the Great Chicago Fire and the French revolution / Adolph Hitler and the atomic bomb / the death of the kings of England.
- Nostradamus only made a few / a lot of / two very specific predictions.
- He wrote his predictions as dialogues between himself and a friend / letters to some wise men / as poems without dates or names.
- This text is probably part of an entertainment magazine article / a cultural magazine article / newspaper article.
